FABER ff MUSIC

BRITTEN composed Reveille in London in March 1937 for the Spanish violinist, Antonio Brosa, who had given the first performance of Britten's Suite, Op.6, at the ISCM Festival in Barcelona in 1936 and was to be the soloist in the first performance of the Violin Concerto, Op.15, in New York in 1940. Reveille was first heard at the Wigmore Hall, London, on 12 April 1937, when Brosa was accompanied by Franz Reizenstein. It was well known among his friends that the violinist found waking up in the morning a difficult undertaking. Hence the title of this concert study (the composer was a notoriously early riser), and hence too the tempo indication Andante-rubato e pigro ('pigro' = 'sluggish, lazy').

Reveille was clearly intended as a virtuoso showpiece for the violin. The piano assumes a subsidiary role, providing a basic harmonic background against which the composer sets off a vivid display of technical fireworks. It provides for the violinist and the recital room what Britten was later to provide for the pianist (with string orchestra) and the concert hall in Young Apollo (1939).

Although the composition sketch for Reveille remained in the composer's possession (and is now in the Britten-Pears Library, at Aldeburgh), the whereabouts of his ink fair copies were not known. The discovery of these manuscripts in the BBC Music Library made possible this important addition to the current series of posthumous publications of Britten's early works.

The publishers are grateful to Hugh Maguire for his editing of the solo part.

JOHN EVANS

BRITTEN komponierte Reveille im März 1937 in London für den spanischen Geiger Antonio Brosa, der im Jahre 1936 im Rahmen des ISCM Festivals in Barcelona Britten's Suite Op.6 uraufgeführt hatte, und der 1940 in New York der Solist bei der Erstaufführung des Violin Concertos Op.15 sein sollte. Reveille wurde erstmals am 12. April 1937 in der Wigmore Hall in London gehört, als Brosa von Franz Reizenstein begleitet wurde. Den Freunden Brosas war wohlbekannt, daß für diesen das Aufwachen am Morgen eine schwierige Sache darstellte. Daher stammt der Titel dieser Konzertstudie (der Komponist war ein notorischer Frühaufsteher), und auch die Tempobezeichnung Andante-rubato e pigro ('pigro' = 'träge, faul').

Reveille war eindeutig als ein virtuoses Schaustück für die Geige gedacht. Das Klavier spielt eine Nebenrolle, indem es den klaren harmonischen Hintergrund liefert, vor dem der Komponist Feuerwerke technischer Brillanz entfaltet. Das Werk bietet für den Geiger und den kleinen Konzertsaal das, was Britten später im Young Apollo (1939) für den Pianisten (mit Streichorchester) und die Konzerthalle komponieren sollte.

Obwohl der Kompositionsentwurf für Reveille im Besitz des Komponisten blieb (und sich jetzt in der Britten-Pears Bibliothek in Aldeburgh befindet), war der Verbleib seiner Reinschriften in Tinte nicht bekannt. Die Entdeckung dieser Manuskripte in der Musikbibliothek der BBC machte diese wichtige Hinzufügung zu der gegenwärtigen Serie von posthumen Veröffentlichungen früher Werke Britten's möglich.

Die Verleger danken Hugh Maguire für die Edition der Solostimme.
